Enggestions to Congress Concerning ed to Follow Closely Along Lines of Indianapolis Speech-Address Is a general way expressed his approval of captain. the railroad legislation President Roosevelt is now expected to ask of Congress next winter.

He did not want to commit himself i advance, and, therefore, would not be quoted, but he observed that the railroads probably should accept the terms the President seemed to have offered them in his Indianapolis speech. They might find the propositions to their favor in the end, just as national banks had profited materially by government supervision.

No one here can tell this far ahead what will come from the recommendations that Endangers Her Own Life to Save Old the President now apparently plans to incorporate in his annual message. These recommendations will probably follow more or less closely the lines of his Indianapolis speech. He will naturally leave many of the details as to whether the railroads or the government shall make an appraisement when it is considered necessary, and the methods of apportionment to be settled by the committees of Congress.

Of course, as heretofore in his reform legislation, the President will attempt to say how the bill will be drawn, and there will be consultations galore with party

Reassuring in Tone.

The tone in which the President discusses the railroad problem is regarded as reassuring. His suggestion for appraisment in only certain instances is interpreted as a concession from the first suggestion that grew out of his earlier conferences with railroad men soon after Congress adjourned. He is not especially inststent upon Federal incorporation, although expressing a preference for it. His proposition to distinguish between the investors and speculators in railroad securities by eventually establishing the approximate value of railroad stocks and bonds, and by giving the public opportunities to know as soon as anybody eise, and just as authoritatively, what these stocks and bonds represent, is favorably commented upon here.

In transmitting the medar the Fest woode Miss Guinan the following let worder Approvate the provisions of the act of Congress of Expresses of the act of Congress of February 23, 1965, an act to promote the savings of life, you have been duly a head almost since the Minister's arrival in Washington. As one official put it yesterday, this plan, as outlined by the President, will eliminate the advantage that those possessine inside information now enjoy.
